In his uncharacteristically conciliatory speech to a joint session of Congress, Barack Obama clearly sided with the tea party. When he said he agreed with House Republicans that the nation was "broke", he was disregarding the overwhelming majority of economists who have said the opposite. And when he endorsed Republican ideas for reform, he showed that he had already given up on one crucial area of policy: tax reform. Most obvious of all, however, was his refusal to resist Republican pressure to rush the formation of a commission to investigate "voter fraud". No respectable Republican leader would demand this: of those who make accusations of electoral fraud, most have been proven false. But both Obama and the Democratic leadership have bought the conspiracy theory, and now they will accept no alternative. Both claims are demonstrably false. Obama has been forced to adjust his version of what caused the mortgage meltdown, because the truth about the financial system and its role in the crash, lies in the way the government has rescued the banks from their failures, and the
