Adobe Photoshop 10 is a brilliant, feature-rich conversion and editing tool. It's a true powerhouse of productivity, and it's the application I primarily use for nearly everything in my post-production workflow because of this. Considering that Photoshop's Notable New Features are almost entirely more robust color management, synchronization, and cloud expansion, it's hard to imagine that you'll be able to find many truly compelling reasons to upgrade to CS11. If you run Photoshop on a computer that's older than 2012 or on a machine that's suddenly not powerful enough to handle the necessary speed and performance, you can opt for CS10 instead. When you do install CS11, you'll find that it's backwards-compatible with earlier, CS10-compatible plugins and filters. The updated version of Photoshop includes the ability to locate, fix, and even correct red-eye in individual photos. It can be invoked automatically by pressing the OK button on any photo that contains visible red-eye - including digital photos taken on camera or with other apps and output from consumer photo printers. It's a powerful function to be sure, but it's also one that you might overlook, since it does its work quietly in the background. If you're one who likes to be proactive about image corrections, you can always use a more user-friendly method like the one found in Lightroom. Adobe now includes four different styles for monitor calibration, to give you more options on where your monitor is set at. It's important that you optimize your monitor settings - you might be missing out on a little screen quality if you don't. Adobe has a good tutorial on this, as well as a streamlined version of the three options previously found in Lightroom.

The Noise and Blur filters filter out small imperfections from the image, which can be used to soften photos or add other effects to your photos. The Generator panel allows you to create your own brushes to apply the blur or noise filter to specific areas of the photo. What It Does: The Posterize filter turns a photo into a monochromatic image by removing colors from the original image. It's especially useful for black and white conversions or for taking photos in a specific lighting environment. You can use the B&W control to specify the darkness or lightness that you wish was the background for your photo. The Highlight & Shadow tool is used to create illumination and shadow effects around areas of interest in your photo. You can apply color and more to a specific area, create perfect contrast and more. The Selective Color tool lets you isolate a specific color in your picture. With the Clone Stamp tool, you can quickly and easily copy and paste specific areas of an image from your photo to the photo Trash. The Smudge tool lets you mimic brush marks from your clothes onto your image, allowing you to simulate on-location work as you modify the look of your photo. You can also combine effects to better control the appearance of your photo. Apply a new filter to blocks of color within the selection mask. The Dehaze tool is also included in the Fill tool and lets you neutralize unwanted haze and additive color cast. You can use the Adjustment Brush to paint over the area of your photo to quickly adjust your photograph's exposure, white balance or sharpness. You can also quickly and easily retouch areas of your photo, like eye makeup, lipstick and more. 933d7f57e6

On the first day of 2020, millions of people around the world are looking forward to starting a brand new year. It means there are new resolutions, new habits, perhaps even a revamp of goals. But while all of this might be good news, it also means there will be a huge reshuffling of what we do or don't do in the year ahead. Not everyone may realize this, but Flash content breaks some of the web's biggest patterns, patterns that many websites use to make purchasing seamless and pleasurable. As the technical support for Flash officially ends on the 1st of January, we thought it'd be timely to highlight why, even if it is being replaced by HTML5, it is still so important to the web. Just about any online retailer wants you to stay as calm and persistent as possible during the purchasing process. So how does Flash fit in the equation? First, Flash's ability to scale up or down incredibly quickly, and you, the user, don't really care about it. The speed that it loads can be key for the user - if you're in a hurry because someone is chasing you down for a missing payment, then you don't as much want that content to take up valuable milliseconds that could be used to complete another transaction. The flash player is usually very reliable, and while there is always the possibility it might break, you are better off having a stable one than the web default player. If the Flash player decides to just stop working, at least you can at least continue without strange hiccups.
