This paper presents a theoretical basis of the principle of Fenton-type calorimetry, and studies the validity of this principle in prediction of the actual absorbed dose. Predictions of the amount of current absorbed per Joule was plotted against the actual value and the regression coefficient was estimated by use of the method of least squares. The analysis was based on the assumption that the energy absorbed by the body (work) is mainly due to steady-state ion flux and that the distribution of the body impedance is entirely resistive. Good correlations (r greater than 0.94) were obtained
